The Essence of Bees Among Flies

by

Keith Pertusio

2014

Summary: A collection of poems seeking meaning in the stories of the past, the powerful emotions of the present, the humor and hope of the future, and the life both inside and outside the prison walls.
Introduction

The road through prison is one of sorting through, of stripping off, of allowing, if willing, the true self lost to brush against you again. It is a confronting of the worst and also the best within you. Both need to be discovered in order to be truly free.

These are my first baby steps toward that freedom as I learn to see others, myself, and the world around us all through clearer eyes. My hope is my journey through words may help others even as the words of others have helped me. There is light found when we all travel together.

If you would like to provide feedback, ask questions, or feel my writing is worthy of your advocacy, feel free to contact me. Thank you for reading.

What is this pipeline connecting my mind to some well within me buried and inaccessible reached only after great effort like searching for paintings lyrical instinctual prehistoric deep in the resonant recesses of a cave?

Poetry is subterranean and once gushed out of me to the surface so pen could barely keep up.
Now it is only accessible after a priming of the pump because channels have run dry hollow tubes rusted or perhaps I have forgotten the way.

It used to be sentences flowed from my hand unbidden almost an annoyance like a runny nose a reminder of life and breathing.

But now
a literary amputation somewhere and it's not the same the exterior sterility breeding internal impotence.

It is only natural.
Trees bend the wind rocks bend the water I must bend words but that takes life
emotion
respiration.
Here I am encased in cement
only the memories do the words of others to help.

I am starving
There is nothing around no tinder to start a fire.

So this poem is written a word at a time each one
caught from a corner discovered under a bed wedged in a book hidden in a photograph each one a leftover from something seen something heard something said each word drawing strength each one inhaling inspiration from the word before.
Starting with the first word brick by brick each by one a poem of beginnings is created a new wall from which all poems in this desert of sand are born.
Riddle

From lion's carcass honey, scooped out from dissipated flesh and bone touch fingers to tongue and find it
sweet.

From this broken body poetry
the essence of bees among flies sweetness
despite its source.

In decay
a hive.
In dissolution
words.

In both a riddle.
Perpetuality

Of all the words ever written how few have been kept.

Each word
a flame as brain synapses connected.

Each word
sparkled
as it was pulled from the ether.

created implanted like the clack of typewriter key.

Each born here in the darkness invisible until hand moves fingers lever against one another and it is written.

Its voice is now a giggle
a groan a sigh
a cry.

It is alive fresh on the page.

But we cannot keep them all these jottings these notations of the activity of our minds.

They must be crumpled into trash cans burned in fires decayed in earth.

I imagine for the sake of my own guilty conscience that as all material around them decomposes incinerates rots words instead grow opaque turn into vapor and rise out of the earth out of the smoke to be absorbed back into the invisible darkness of their first and perpetual birth.

Their
bonds disintegrate all relax
into their sounds into their inflections into their silence.

There
they wait patiently in the swirling mosaic of individual colorful letters for the blinding lighting of thought to seize them join them and bring them again to dazzling satisfying
life.
Let others sort it out what is right or wrong fair or unfair deserved or undeserved too much or too little let others figure out the punishments or rewards the fame or obscurity the hope or despair
the smile or the frown Let others invoke in the name of God or nothing of patriotism or rebellion of justice or compassion of progress or tradition let others decide Let others judge Let others look at your life pick through the pieces and put them in boxes labeled Good Bad Masculine Feminine Success
Failure
Let others put them on their scales Let others throw their laurels or darts Let them fling labels Let them give Let them take away
Let them whirl around you picking patting Let them
Let them

But you
awake this morning feel the tug of purpose of Spirit's direction the irresistible calling compelling you
to move to do to plunge into delicious action because it makes your heart skip your breath quicken your eyes open wide your smile open wider be satisfied be anchored in the inhale be rooted in the exhale work with fingers intertwined with the you who skips inside
who runs through the meadow with arms wide open pretending
for the simple pleasure of pretending to fly

That meadow is empty and it is simply you
and the persistent pulse of the morning sun
Unseen

You are a shaman
and you have your feather hanging off your hair your fingers.
You have your drum and it has a living voice rawhide speaks through your mallet
your fingers.
You fling your potent offerings milk or blood pollen or vodka spinning around you.

Surrounded by your animal bones your rattles and fierce masks worn ribbons and pungent herbs You sit on your rug singing chanting
until like the flick of a switch your eyes close hands twitch body trembles as the spirit enters with whispers shrills and murmurs bringing oracles and guidance to creative life.

One moment you are here the next moment the ethereal world riding a horse or dancing with the ancestors consumed by the intersection of earth and immaterial realms
Your friends hold you down or up until you collapse to the ground exhausted spent.

I sit here in the darkness night after night and pray
feeling nothing.
I am told to press on that all this makes a difference.

I believe it.

But oh
to be a shaman so obvious so clear that something is happening

that something in this world is altered
when my lips so desperately move.
Epiphany

The column of air for each is anchored on something solid each molecule each shaft of light aligned above perfectly resting on your shoulders.

There is no weight only a soft pressure as something descends something steps down and lays across your weariness.

Relax in the straight the balanced
 the orderly.
This pillar touches a distant point in space passes outstretched stars terminates at its beginning that eternal Something and sometimes that Something
 comes down
and all other words
 fall away
 tears streaming there remains for you
 the one word over and over just saying just repeating knees weak eyes closed just that endless word time irrelevant.

Until
when the time has ended when everything for that moment has been fulfilled
 rises again
 past known edges past knowing itself and you are alone sitting trembling
listening to people talking doors slamming phones ringing

but still whispering the great wheel turning now with its own momentum
still murmuring that one beautiful word.
From now on, everyone will be free to make their own mistakes and not learn from them burn their own bridges allow once-in-a-lifetime opportunities to slip through their fingers ignore sound advice take advantage of the generosity of others squander second and third chances be a self-satisfied agitator or a spineless martyr pursue dead ends, unattainable dreams, and self-delusions blew a fortune on pleasures that last a minute create long lists of people hurt, relationships severed, and believers betrayed never speak to loved ones and never go home fall into addictions ruinous to all choose empty happiness in empty things fornicate blindly, eat excessively, heed compulsively, drink endlessly walk the same destructive path so many, across time, have walked and achieve the same results
ruin their own lives cry their own tears swim in their own regrets create their own mistakes live their own pain

From now on, everyone is free to be human not because these things are best but because we must own our lives
which are soaked in beauty in ugliness

live their own imperfect lives so in all the mess and in all the garbage we can cling to one another hold each other's tears so when lives are in ruins we can look eye to eye and truthfully say to one another I understand.
I am so hollow when all I have inside melts away.
I am an old empty gasoline can a few pebbles rattle inside as a gust blows me across dry fields.
I have enough stones now to weigh me down so I cannot move.
My ribs curve around like fingers cupping air after a life of filling up with nothing.
They are dry branches rubbing against one another in this lonely wind and I feel how hollow I am with an emptiness as wide as the soundless airless
expense of space.
I fall into it
that hollowness
that empty space that cage between spine and sternum.

Until I talk to you and I am stuffed with endless snow days glitter-covered cats elusive books to crave and a middle school concert with glorious costume changes and tunes from Phantom And I am so full I strain to hold it all in and when I breathe I hurt with happiness.
Some People

Some words
writhes and squirm press against the walls beg to be expressed.

Some thoughts
ensnared and knotted in a ball hiss and rattle wave their threads beg to be pulled and untangled

Some fears shimmer in a black varry capsule drip core and salt beg to be held and kissed.

Some memories sink as molten weights bulge lining of stomachs pour hot acid into throats beg to be relieved.

prick us until we dissolve into rainbow puddles unravel us into strings hold us until we find constellations
in the chaos of the stars begging us to only ask.

Then we beg with all the other beggars and we are restored.

Cemetery

In this colonial cemetery head stones toppled rubbed bare even fallen and buried beneath inches of soil A third of the graves hold children whose parents clasped their little hands as they weakened and then slipped away Erased by some disease that with modern medicine would have been so simple so easy
To fix.

In my graveyard there are children too - a third gone and buried a third slipping away a third still standing.
Yet all have been weakened by something

By someone

that with today's insight
so easy
To fix.
Deserving

They asked me for my clothes my ring
   my watch but they did not ask me for my poetry.
I wonder if I should have turned it in.

It's a question of having of deserving lines and words arranged into radiant beauty brittle ugliness of taking such delicate things and knitting them together with hands these hands which are covered in scot in grime guilty hands bloody hands.

It's a debate of the right to form in the same mind — which somehow made evil justified within it constructing such horror beyond anything I thought myself capable of bringing to life to form in this mind poems and flowers and starry skies and love and humor.
Have I not lost the right to it all?

Yet somehow here it all is unhidden.

My mind
   now healing now realizing pours it out and I write doubting the whole time whether I can say these are mine that I this monster
could create them.

For those who feel they are not mine to claim be assured my poems are suffering
cause suffering.
Rejoice that I suffering greatly.

I could numb before screen within music behind book pages but instead I must feel
must feel.

In poetry there is great feeling so that in the tense release of words
of ideas there rises up within more of me more realization of others than I ever let through before and I am for once.

Real.

Then in this realness comes pain deep pain
even in the beauty in the horror as I think of them.

I deserve suffering but do I deserve poetry?

These poems
come with suffering so perhaps poetry
is exactly what I deserve what I need here.
I must be despised.
  For too long
  I have survived off the approval of others
I must be useless.
  For too long
  I have measured my worth on the strength of my usefulness.
I must be helpless.
  For too long
  I have prided myself on my self-made competency.
I must be alone.
  For too long
  I have used others to avoid myself.
I must be neurotic.
  For too long
  I have worn the mask of having life all together
I must be flayed.
  For too long
  I have hid behind a wall of morality and platitudes.
I must be lost.
  For too long
  I have arrogantly blindly led.
I must be afraid.
  For too long
  I have numbed fears gnawing
  with mindless stupor.
I must be broken.
  For too long
  the fake glue of pride has held me deceptively together.
I must be imprisoned.
  For too long
  freedom to choose has held me in chains.
But here
on this refuse pile beneath darkness and weight beyond the sound of voices
I am stripped melted away until all I will have one day
is you
me.

It is a gift.

a root has waited for such darkness in which to grow.
Stand in line
if I have hurt you in big ways or small.
It is a long line
and some of you should move to the front.

for it is a long line
created from birth.
I feel each one of you your pull the crackle of your energy.
I slump beneath the weight of the buckets you carry.

and at some point in my mind I have visited each one of you
and have felt your pinch
your twist the overwhelming cloud of my responsibility.
Some I visited daily.

and I put you here against your will and there is nowhere I can walk where I do not stumble from the heaviness.

It works to keep me quiet and humble and thoughtful.

where some of you have extended to me
silence hostility ambiguity and others undeserved grace.
I accept it all.

Some
sensing my struggle point over their own shoulders to the line trailing behind them and we mourn
together
the different types of humanness within us all wishing to go back and choose differently.

if I have hurt you.
and I know
and regret the hurt goes on for us both.

All I have is what I can say.
All I have is what I can do.
Even with your weight you propel me and you are in every step I take.

The line is long it is attached to my soul but that is what compels me to try harder
and harder
and harder.
Did I move
  just one inch farther?
I don't need much.
  I just need to know
there is a space however small between the back of my heels today and where they were yesterday.

Am I closer to God is the divide a little narrower?
Am I more kind?
  Do I hold my head
a little taller?

Have I climbed a millimeter higher over this wall once insurmountable?

Am I mindful
  even one second longer?

Did I laugh
  just one more laugh than yesterday?

Have I paid
  one cent more on all I owe?

I don't need miles though miles would be nice.
I just need an inch because stretched over all my days
I will have a foot a yard a mile a horizon until the final step over and inches won't matter.

But may I still know
  each one
has made me ready?
It is these times
the ordinary times
the day-to-day times the put on your pants and shirt tie your shoelaces and walk out the door times the sunrise then sunset five-day forecast times the coffee in the morning TV remote at night times that slowly kill.

You are heroic
you swing your battle ax sparks explode off your shield into the smoke of burning thatch roofs as you parry the blow of an iron mace and step over the cooling horse carcass.
This land is yours to conquer these fjords, these cliff top meadows these stone walls, this grazing field these will all be yours.
Roar through your blackened teeth above the tempest of sounds crashing flames, ealy shrine staccato of clanging weapons.

You are the hero created to stomp through oily bogs cross the ocean to Iceland or scale the Alps to conquer Rome.

These are your genetics your destiny.

But you look out this sliver of window only a postcard view of the mountains.
This is all they say you are good for.

The Himalayas, the Carpathians the Pacific, the Sargasso the Sahara, the Amazon the stratosphere, the surface of Mars they pulse through your veins.
When they are given life they will explode in you and you become the sun and you can do so much good.
When they are held repressed and contained they eat through your heart's lining.

To die ordinarily never knowing one is a hero
 is a tragedy.
But to live ordinarily knowing you have heroic finger prints the weight of history behind you is living death.

Do you feel it within you?
It is exhaling
 or death
 now.
Encapsulated

Concrete buildings fashioned from gray and fog unsmiling and dour statues squat on abrasive macadam heavy and ponderous.
They raise their megalithic heads as we try to catch the orange of a sunset the cotton green of far off trees the syrupy blue beneath the clouds parade.
Like playground bullies they arch to block our line of sight as they defiantly, provokingly maneuver their cement torsos between us and the living, lightweight colors in order to smother the spark of life and hope which smells like freedom.
The fences, too, dance around us skipping in an endless circle laughing and jeering at us rattling their razor wire in sadistic glee encouraging the buildings on goad us to "Do something about it" sneering at our helplessness.
They've snatched our view from our hands and toss it back and forth between them daring us, taunting us while we foolishly
try to catch it.
And we know what's happening how we look, the humiliation but we still try to snatch the view anytime it comes near.

We can only see in front of us we are taught to limit and strangle our range
our vision until all we can see is our feet darting out in front of us first one, then the other shuffling across the concrete.

Eyes to the ground we ride the conveyor belt to chow
  to yard to pill line

Our world reduced to salivating over a brownie a little bigger than the rest or a full bag of commissary items

Hoping that something good is on TV.

I have looked too many times to the sodden tears of the past to the scratching fears of the future and have missed the sweetness of today this minute this second.

Put a fence around today hem it in, enclose it fast imprison this moment in your impenetrable arms.

Put a fence around it all blind to all else block off the sky until you are forced to find

The sacred in the compassionate
  the good
  the God
  the humanity
  the expansive vision

  in this breathtaking sparkling goode called
Right Now.
Part I

Touch here is rare
I am startled by it Fat me on the back and I will jump Brush my arm and I will cringe I flinch from the electric shock of flesh connecting establishing a circuit with me.

   taboo in its nuances and insinuations It raises questions and curiosity.
A hand's touch on my shoulder ripples through me nerves rolling like waves to a pool that needs it pleads for human contact but that harbors dark islands of wondering of suspicions.

   because it is hard to interpret.
   so I fear occasional exposure to it -
   walking away thinking wondering What did it mean?
Even if touch is filled with all the innocence and friendship the world could hold It is a struggle to appreciate and relax into.
It is only cautiously affirming

Part II

Long sweeps of contact whisk across my scalp to the buzz of the clippers.
Fingertips touch and press guiding and commanding into my soft temples leaving their fingerprints.
The tiny teeth chatter nibble up and back a miniscule massage.
My ears are pressed down folded to trim behind them.
The buzzing of blades lull me sing to me and I sink into their melody their movement and the way they jostle every nerve.
The pool is filled
until next month.
Nissing

In the morning the rattling heating unit echoes off macadam vibrates past concrete faces rubs against coiled razor-wire.

It is the only sound awake this early.

Sometimes
I think it is the chorus of crickets.
Tumbleweeds

Why do I want to stuff this ear with tumbleweeds?

What is it about this rusted crumbling frame that makes me yearn to push them one after another into its decaying interior?

Why do I love
the sound of those brittle tangles of awful sticks and spines scratching up against cracked windows
those biting fanged scales falling with the patter of dropping beetles to the rotting carpet as I push as I push again each one bending compressing cracking entangled with one another but wanting so badly to burst out to be round and rolling again?

Why do I want to slam that hollow door
tumbleweeds
staring at me pressing spines clawing
through windshield through windows as I walk away?

Perhaps
I want them to hear the wind blow outside and know they too are stuck are strangled
are imprisoned.
Dear,

It is best to let your color palette revolve around neutrals.
They are timeless earthy
and provide a balanced aesthetic.

Next
add a bold punch of color
a splash of interest.
It provides a dramatic vibe of contrast that pops against the natural backdrop.

In little natural light tan walls beige cabinets white sheets
gray blankets

I leave a bright round orange
on my cabinet.
Belief

As a child
I doubted,

Was it even possible for a flannel beard with its flat floppy flannel characters to contain on its fussy horizon all the currents all the wind — whipped vortex of a story?

Yet I hoped,

But how her slow hands failed me rerearranged characters adding flannel elements so slowly
slow lips intoning losing the story, too busy focusing on what the slow hands were doing fumbling fingers swiping those lifeless figures few her hands
unwound the strands of legend
even as her lips tried to weave them.

I believed

the power of words the energy of story could animate those lifeless flannel people and make them leap love stumble
and get back up again.

I mourned

She was human but still I begged her only to sway with the rise and fall of it all like a snake charmer's flute until flannel people danced mesmerized by the intoxicating river of story
until only her voice was needed the drama on this board now living moving as her slow fingers could fall to her side.

It must have been possible for how those words filled me

made me a boy so shy a boy so reserved dance inside.
Festival

Let us unfurl this sheet this tablecloth this sari reds and oranges
so much red checkerboards and flowers patterns on outstretched arms high above our heads bracelets sliding to our elbows.

Let us form a quilt squares of upturned fabric rectangles of texture.
you must have two of you to hold your piece so high.

Let us open blue umbrellas
tops in our hands bright blossoms
their handles like stamen reaching for the sun.

Let us move and wave until we are one ocean
our movements crashing against one another.

Let us smile
beneath this surface touching shoulders with one another we are colorful here too.

Let us laugh
through our happy screams as rice sprinkles down from the sky onto our swaying dancing
sea of cloth and faces
hitting with the patter of rain upon rolling water.
Four Dresses

Four little dresses dry on a long clothesline.
The summer sun filters through the gauze and lace and they are illuminated opaque like glasses of pink and yellow
lemonade.
They inhale the breeze their frilly folds swaying the tall wall of green grasses behind them swaying base rising up like fog and they are all mysterious as they dry in the sunlight.
The ground is mud beneath them a black volcanic mud and all that holds these colorful, perfect dresses above the strains of such rich mud are the plastic pinched fingers of orange clothespins so much relying on their molded sticks and rusty tiny springs.
Yet the dresses dance precariously with youthful indifference their long ribbons twisting teasing above the mud as if some of the twirls and spins leaps and hope of the little girls still cling to them.
They dance with uninhibited joy the sun exciting the lingering happiness that despite washing has saturated the fibers until they bounce playfully headless of the mud below but only feeling the sun above warming their ruffled shoulders.
Mountains

The mountains stand over us hanging above our heads whispering so only we can hear crush
   crush
and we expect them to disassemble into boulders rumbling rolling descending down in some avalanche to crush us beneath their jagged edges their ancient weight and then to reassemble somewhere else
to stand royally
as new mountains over someone else.

When they don’t When they hold themselves back standing silently instead we call them benevolent. we feel their strength add stone to our insides.

We call them majestic for it is in their restraint
We recognize their power.
It is in their beauty we allow their threat to form in us
the first breath of satisfied
   security.
Autumn Pursuit

Coated in the evidence of a summer spent drinking the orange liquid of the sun the autumn leaves lie thick upon the cooling ground like footprints of a great army in sand overlapping edging over one another each a monument telling how three seasons marched between those dark trees.

The sun low on the horizon smooths these flakes of gold which somehow had fallen from the soldiers' backpacks covering the dying grass and sticks felled by some summer storm.

The leaves spread so far and wide.

Stand in one place and orange paths radiate like a thousand pointing fingers in all directions leading pursuers on false trails beneath every tree and between every bush.

The warm seasons have marched through and no one knows where they have gone.

A breeze begins to hum

new damp

now sweet scented with mist

A herald

of the rain to follow.

Dark clouds
tower in the west

this wind

then

their voice touching earth.

Pushing through our hair it tells the future and we are lifted.

The marigolds tremble.

Is it

the wind

weaving through them or could it be joys or anticipation?

Restoration

Only fifty pages
  of words
  folded double in his pocket slowed the .38 bullet enough so when it punctured his cavernous chest it simply rattled around and made its permanent home by one of his ribs.

He touched his shaking fingers to his lips waiting for the rivulets of blood to seep between his ivory teeth out his keyboard mouth and dribble down crimson puddles on his white, starched shirt.
He drew his hand away dry
  as he reached into his jacket pocket and pulled out those death - defying
  words.

He lovingly spoke
  each word
  even the fallen ones each syllable
  even those missing until they all lived again
  floating with such significance
  into the crowd
  like red red balloons.

As he spoke weaker more determined he dropped those sheets one by one
and they saw each one punctured together telling how they had pushed that bullet away from his heart so he could always speak them into existence.

He had always honored words acknowledged their power to shape people so now the words had done their work sacrificed themselves threw themselves into the bullet's path huddled voluntarily to be vaporized by its velocity.

They had done so for they knew he loved them and would bring them to life again.

There are bullets biting outside but I as I read as I write words delicious words do not feel them.
This is the work words do for one who loves them:
wrapping shielding cushioning protecting even while bullets buzz unheard transforming within this bubble until there is strength for another adventure another safari another Panama Canal and another charge up San Juan Hill.
First

Everything monumental starts at some infinitesimal point a slip
  a shift a conversion microscopic change
bringing down
  homes cities continents and lives erupting from a fraction of a fraction of a fraction of something A single filament of earth slides
San Francisco is shaken flat.
  A trigger for a millimeter moves Kent State sprouts red puddles.
  A gray grain of powder sparks Sarajevo births death trenches.
  One atom’s nucleus jumps Hiroshima disappears.
  Grinding plates of inscrutable tonnage Colliding forces of change and status quo Immeasurable momentum of dueling empires Old and new eras of human carnage

All pressed and taut on their infinite fault lines until that one pinpoint
  moves
and then things rumble vanish nothing after recognizable.

Only afterwards
all we have is history the knowledge in hindsight given all the factors involved of all its tragic inevitability.
So we fear that tiny point waiting unseen in our future never knowing what gesture oversight or slip will cause everything to unravel.

Then we look - one more photon of light is reflected on a cloud flipping the switch from the tyranny of overwhelming night to the bright optimism of glorious day.
Part One: Labor
(A poem by Frank Conroy)

I paid
old Mrs. Schreiner $2.00 for 59 bundles of corn fodder on March 31st, so that I still have 35 bundles to get.
Sell the tobacco,
Mary,
for what it will fetch and bury me
and keep the rest.
Sell my guns
and all you do not need and keep the money.
Get Abe Carpenter's boys to finish stripping the tobacco.
I am tired of this life, Mary,
and I am about my last.
Your Papa, Frank Conroy

P.S.
Good Bye
Mary.
I took the fatal dose April 2
at 4 past 3 in the afternoon.

Part Two: Harvest

I picked up the corn fodder Mrs. Schreiner owed you like you asked.
She gave me
your $2.00 back.
Abe Carpenter's boys came and stripped the tobacco while I was gone before I even had a chance to ask them.
I sold the tobacco and they gave me more than it was worth.
They said it was real good tobacco.
I took the money
and I buried you; Papa;
beside Mama near the garden where you and I used to grow sweet pea on trellises you made me with hands I used to hold.
I kept your guns
because they remind me you never wanted to leave a mess
for anyone else.
I took Mama's quilt you kept on your bed and Mama's china plates, your tools worn smooth, the photo you kept from my graduation and in the end I just kept everything.
I am tired of this life too, Papa,
but I understand and I know your tired.

P.S.
Good bye
Papa.
I came home
April 17
just in time to watch the sun set behind your empty expectant fields.
The Carpenter boys said they'd help me plant.

Note: Part one is a verbatim suicide note from 1884. Mr. Conroy poisoned himself with laudanum at home where he lived alone after the death of his wife. On his grounds, his neighbors found three head of cattle, one horse, and one dog.
His request had been denied but the word had not yet arrived so he, still hoping stepped forward into a new life gathering the pieces around him and slipping them into his suitcase to ride the Greyhound bus to his open door.
He packed his assumption and tucked it behind thoughts of anticipation and the nerves of the new trusting they would say yes that all he had been through would count for something that sympathy for pain would spark behind their eyes
so they would embrace decency resolving past as he steps into his future.

But they, far away
in their clicking machine cut off from the sound of human voices by the opening of file folders by gossip giggled across phones by the pounding of rubber stamps and the clicking of forms being filled But they, far away
in their own lives drained of hope devoid of story sickened by cynicism Denied his request uttering about policy must protect the policy must worship the policy they name their pet "policy" and hide behind its purr So they don't have to hear the sounds of humming tires
the rattle of hope and healing
in a young man as he rides with growing confidence toward his glowing future not knowing how they would flippantly crush him.
Importance

He carried the dry packet of photos in his top right-hand pocket to which his badge was pinned.
I have photos, he thought and knew he was the only one with such photos
the only one in the world.
They weighed heavy on his chest heavier even than the silver metal badge.

He knew those were important.
Inside their 3 by 5 walls were colors were images
was a person and sagebrush
sand and small brown rocks fused together in a way that was so important

He was important with those heavy photos.
But that importance was lost unless unless someone knew but no one did unless he reached above that badge and pulled that paper husk slipped out those photos so glossy they appeared wet and passed them around.

A German tourist
totered on the lip
of the deep canyon before a gust of wind cought him.

He flew for those long seconds with the swallows with the black crows.
Did he stretch out his arms to soar above the cottonwood the sagebrush
the sand with its small brown rocks?

His eight-hundred foot descent ended in that hot brown earth the earth of the ancients.

He was so far from home when they reached him.
And his spirit flown across the ocean to home or had he joined the spirits already whispering through the red sandstone canyon with its dark streaks of varnish
and its abandoned haunted houses in the cliffs?

The photos were passed around and they made faces of disgust tongues sticking out curious of this twisted thing lying among the sagebrush the yellow rabbitbrush and sand.
They laughed nervously while passing photos to those who respectfully reverently closed their eyes and passed them on not looking.

But it did not matter whether they looked or not.
The photos were his
and he smiled and felt important.
So Close

We huddle.
We stand so close.
The sides of the road are wide open enough for the white trucks to park.
There are many of us and we are scattered.

But we stand in groups of three of five
our shadows merging on the dusty sandy ground.
We stand with brothers sisters strangers little ones holding onto bigger ones
backpacks on our backs our own or someone else's who was too tired too tiny
to carry it any further our whole life there inside pink across our sloped shoulders inside gray against our weary back.

There is soft light there is comforting energy off of each one of us.
We stand in each other's glow
trembling.
We have this wide
wide open spaces.
There is nothing from here to the horizon only dirt and patches of dry grass but we huddle.
We stand so close.
We touch
and it helps us breathe while those in uniforms stand behind open truck doors
together
while we all beneath a sky threatening rain can only wait.
Cloths

This is the most important, isn't it?

Cloths move like billowing sheets layers of white and gray across open spaces the chemicals tear throats biting smoke of cannon and rifle or singeing steam of spitting gas they are the sensations of war of conflict of protest.

There are always cloths scattered all over the ground.
Why so much cloth every time and where does it come from?

Cloths dropped or torn from bodies as they charge
or flee.
Cloths soaked in blood or saturated by water cannon souls sprawled on pavement blocking reflections of hazy streetlights or decaying on hot grassy meadows strangling green life beneath.

In violence the cloths drop first and then the bodies.
As they run
there is softness beneath their feet.

But one cloth
Who will hold it up a flag
a defiant message in rumble of cannons in thump of teargas canisters?

Every conflict has one.

There is always a believer to hold the flag a bandage a gas mask
a scarf around their head.

Before the flames before the spotlights before the sparking of weaponry Before the screaming or silent
horde

They stand astride things burning among people writhing upon ideas compelling a solid silhouette always waving that flag which is so different from the flag of their enemies but often more often the same.

Amidst the clouds amidst the cloths amidst the chaos this is the most important, Isn't it?
Confession

If only those who beat him and extracted a false confession from his agony had been North Korean.

With bizarre syntax stilted phrasing
odd colloquialisms
read from a sheet of paper over the TV everyone would have laughed at such a confession so obviously coerced and so tragically comical.

Instead
he suffered in prison thirty years for a crime he never committed.

His confession — flawless.
Munching

She was supposed to watch the cows as they grazed in the grasses and wild flowers beside the long country lane.
But the sun was so warm and the cows
moved so slowly she lay down in the dry, crisp grass and fell asleep.

She woke to the sound of munching
all around her head.
She kept her eyes closed just listening
knowing the cows stood tall above her their shade waking her their shadows encircling her as they moved like slow ships.

She had forgotten much but she still remembered the sound of that funny
that comforting munching all around her ninety years later.
Epitaph

I was startled by your name wedged so earily
in an index comprising the last few pages of a book about the Spanish Inquisition.

I found myself wondering what you had done to get yourself there.

A virtual machine to enhance the children's pretending.
the lines reared.

Yet there you were Bible,
bigamy
blasphemy Bosch, Hieronymous
stacked upon your head.

Douglass only needed to visit the time machine.
Then
the resurrection of the Civil War.

You stood quietly brothels Buenos Aires
burning at the stake a list of burning places beneath your feet.

A string encircling him beneath his rat wings.
Then
flight and his children's laughter.

I suspect in your death this is exactly how you a lover of sweet simile of delicate metaphor would choose to spend your eternity.

Two words
impaled by a comma among such weighty such dreadful
such wonderful
words.

Waiting silently across the years anticipating a victim like me to wander by so you could leap out and hear them shriek.

Yes, that would be like you and to think I nearly stumbled past your tombstone
here on this page inscribed simply

Bradbury, Ray

Rockets rumble
one by one.
Then
in the silence of Mars
a giggle
of delight.
Footprint

I think the next time a broken oil pipe buckles its crude onto the ground contaminating plants, streams, and lush trees with its smothering, stinking saliva the first thing that should be done is to erect large, three-story bird feeders bursting with birdseed and peanut butter suet throughout the shiny, bubbling pool.

I'm sure the birds flying over would not be off put by the viscous cone and would instead flitter unharmed to those feeders to stuff their beaked faces with quality seed made possible by Exxon BP
or who ever's turn it is to pour pollution into the natural landscape.

I think other birds might stand on one side cock their little heads to the left and then the right and balance risk and reward Risk - acid fumes rising off sun-baked blackness Reward - an endless supply of seed to stuff in their bloated bird bellies.

They can make their own decisions.

So many bird feeders (definitely make them colorful and festive) would attract huge flocks of migrating fowl and probably some exotic ones with fascinating and scintillating plumage.
Tourists would park their cars on the road beside the massive, stinking spill get out their sunglasses and binoculars and watch excitedly for birds to cross off their lists.

The community could recoup some money that way
so once all the oil leaches into their groundwater they have a little nest egg of cash an untouched reservoir to help them start again somewhere else.

I think once the tourism of bird watching really gets established people wouldn't be in such a big hurry to clean up that huge swath of oil.
Oil Company: "Hey, do you want us to take care of that gigantic oil slick there?" Community: "Oh no. We're good. Take care of it when you can. Oh, thanks for all the bird feeders."

Of course, they would have to clean it up eventually.
It is toxic, after all.

But all those fancy bird feeders all those spectacular birds would soften the blow and then maybe people wouldn't be so quick to judge.

Reflections on Deer Necks

I.

It is the long graceful necks of deer that contributes to the urge for some hunters to blow him or her away to munch on his or her haunches and then mount that head with its long graceful neck on a woed plaque on the wall.

That neck seems tailor-made for connecting that majestic head with its pensive glass eyes to the wood.

Imagine the implications if the deer did not have that long graceful neck. Would anyone want to mount that head flat on the plaque flush with its surface looking like the deer had fallen through the ice and just its head pecked frantically desperately at the world before slipping under deep into the frigid water?

II.

A man sees that no-necked head flat on the wall. He grips his own neck and suddenly feels that tight necktie choking him that starched collar squeezing him.

He tears away the tie. He rips away the buttons.
He shreds his shirt and bare chested snatches that mounted deer breaks away the strangling weed and runs screaming primally
into the woods with it wild and free.

III.

Would natural selection favor
the no-necked deer?
If so,
it might relieve the regular deer still tramping through the forest to not hold up their long graceful
heads so high.
Drones Snapshots

If everything goes south drones won't matter.
So I guess I shouldn't get too excited.
It's just a shame no one would be around to appreciate them because,
as they flit around euphorically evoking the playful spirit of a child, that seems to be what they live for.

II.

I did not see in the fine print anything saying
I could not own
a drone.
I guess you didn't think of that.

III.

If I climbed to the top of Mt. Everest and brought a drone
could I fly it higher than my head without cheapening
my accomplishment?
It seems at the peak
nothing should be higher than me.

IV.

In the divorce settlement I get to keep the drone.
That's okay.
You refused to learn how to fly it.
The glee written on the dog's face as he watched
the drone
faded to dismay as he realized
he was no longer needed.

VI.

Put a mixed martial arts fighter and a drone operator in a cage.
I'd put my money on the one with the best choke hold.

VII.

Ansel Adams
in his darkroom shakes the pen and lifts out a photo of El Capitan.

But there to the right of the falls

a drone.

Adams is pissed.

VIII.

I suppose someday like all technology seems to go
we will only talk to each other through our drones.
There
three hundred feet up we'll talk via dips and wiggles and somehow
we'll understand.
Denial

You read me your poetry over the phone and it so moved me I rushed back and attempted to express all I was feeling in some lines of poetry.
I only wrote a few lines before I stopped and wondered if writing a poem
about the experience somehow cheapens
the whole thing if perhaps
a poem
about your poetry would drain the energy from your creations.

Then I thought:
see must I write a poem about every profound experience I have?

Can't I just enjoy the moment without running for pen and paper?
Must every moment be some opportunistic chance to jot something down?
Must I find the poetic significance in everything?
So instead
I simply remembered your poems and how I felt as you read them.
(proud full of awe connected)
I was going to write
a poem
about the whole thing.

Good thing
I didn't.
